

I believe time at home is private. No one should be subject to advertisement, phone solicitations etc if they have not opted to be subject to it (ie watching TV). I feel like it is a violation of my personal space and time when I get telemarketing calls primarily because they are 1)aggressive 2)excessively recurring (I donated once and now a group calls me every couple of months despite the fact that they said I would only be contacted annually) 3)not always truthful.(e.g. "You've one a trip to Florida...."). As I said before, I don't believe anyone deserves that nature of treatment (and disrespect) in the comfort of their own home during their personal private time. I vehemently disagree with the "Bankers Association's" request to weaken the No Call Law so they can call me about new insurance programs and credit card offers. If they want to solicit their business, they should do so via a different non-invasive medium, one traditional to business practices, e.g. print advertising, television advertising, in-branch promotions.
